When you stop assuming you're the reference point in other people's situations, you'll be able to see and relate to people more compassionately.

You will stop taking other people's behavior personally because you stop running it through your own assumptions and biases.